This Afternoon.

According to Weather Prophet Smith, who is temporarily filling Farmer Dunn's place in the local Weather Bureau, the first of the races between the contestants for the America's Cup will be started in murky weather, with These conditions, Mr. Smith says, will be favorable for a good race, but not very agreeable for spectators.

It will rain a little, and to-morrow morning. Still, according to Mr. Smith, the weather will not be nice and clear until just about the time the yacht-race should be crossing the finish line.

If Mr. Smith is right in his prognostication, the weather to-morrow will be vagrant weather, and with a full-sail breeze the Yankee cup-defender may be able to show her heels to the Dunraven.

Ship carpenters were still at work this

At 11:55 o'clock the work on Valkyrie was finished, and the dock workers then began taking down the slings preparatory to filling the dry-dock with water and floating the English vessel. There were about five hundred men present at the time.

In forty-five minutes after the water was turned on, the dry-dock Valkyrie was afloat. She was then made as light as possible by the removal of everything not required on board, preparatory to being measured this afternoon.

The yacht, to be taken ashore, was painted black. She went into the water this afternoon with a coat of paint laid on her bottom.

About 2:20 o'clock Lord Dunraven arrived at the Erie Basin and went on board his yacht. The work of measuring Valkyrie began at 2:30.

It will be dark before the big boat's measurements are taken, and they will be given out at the New York Yacht
